National Theatre — Emma Abbott Opera Company.

"Honest little" Emma Abbott, as New York endearingly calls her, was warmly welcomed last evening by a very large and fashionable audience. She had chosen for her initial appearance the part of Marie in Donizetti's "Daughter of the Regiment," and by her brilliant execution of the many choice gems of the opera roused her listeners to unbounded enthusiasm, which found vent in almost continuous appliance, and in repeated demands for tinuous applause, and in repeated demands for oucores and calls before the curtain. Particular mention must be made of her supurb rendition of "France, I Adore Thee" and "The Last Rose of Summer,' the former being sung with great force, and the latter with much delicacy of expression. In the course of the evening Miss Abbott was presented with a magnificent floral design nearly two feet high, a tribute of a number of Washington admirers. The part of Tonic was well sung by Tom Karl, who seemed, however, to labor under a slight who seemed, however, to labor under a slight who seemed, however, to labor under a sligh who seemed, however, to labor under a slight cold which made itself disagreeably perceptible once or twice. Mr. Ellis Ryse as Sergeant Sal Pizzio was very acceptable. The chorus was not as satisfactory as it might have been if it had been under better training, and the male portion is rather weak. The orchestra did fairly well. This evening "Paul and Virginia," with Miss Abbott as Virginia and Mr. Castle as Paul.
